

Parents and friends of men in the navy need not fear that they are not warmly clad these winter days. This picture shows a deck crew at stations passing through the submarine zone, each man clad in the new windproof costume.

Photos copyright by Paul Thompson.

The costume complete except for thick woollen gloves. The life preserver adds comfort.

Paul Thompson.

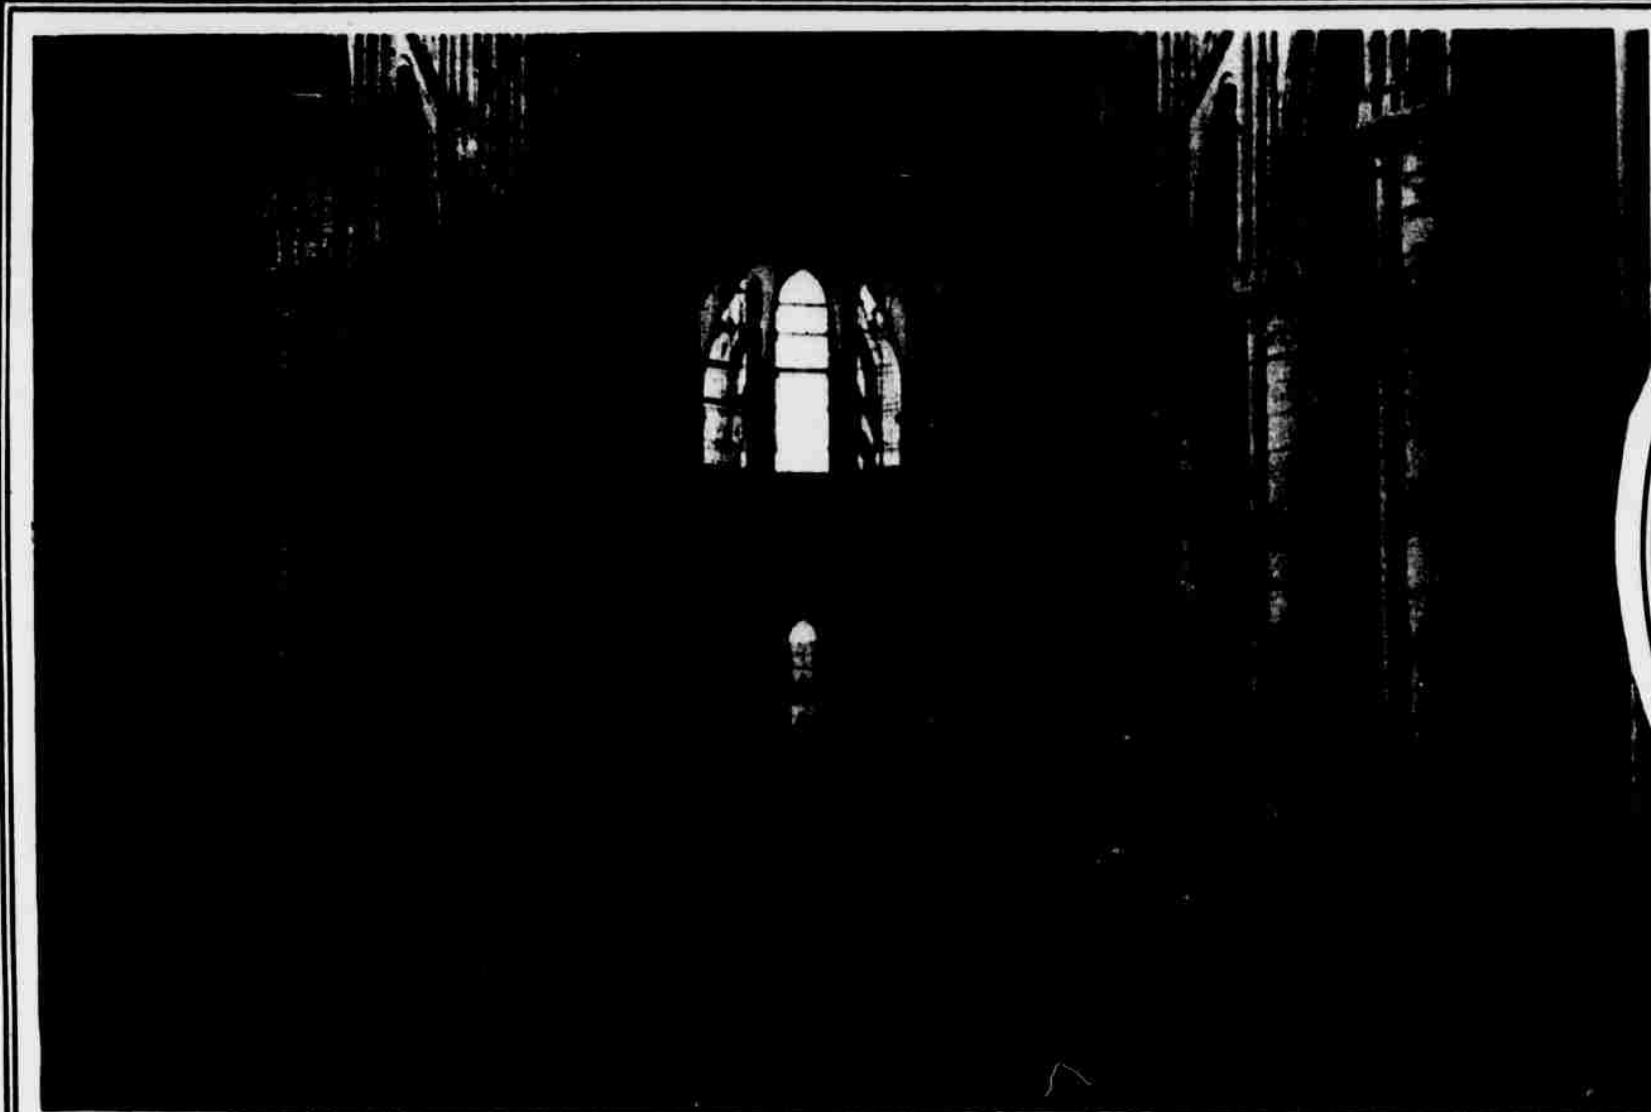

International Film Service.

"Mike" Pounds (right), son of ex-Borough President Lewis H. Pounds of Brooklyn, is reading a letter from home. He is in France, and his bed, when he gets a chance to sleep, is the cot on which he is seated.

These sturdy Frenchmen are "soldats d'elite," shock troops who are picked for unusually dangerous and strenuous work. They lead the way in going over the top, clean out hostile trenches and attack machine nests and are known as the bravest of the brave.

International Film.

A railway in a cathedral is a queer sight, but necessary in this case. So great was the damage done the beautiful edifice at Soissons that the men engaged in restoring it had to run cars inside to carry away the debris made by German shells.

Photo by Pictorial Press.

President Wilson looks puzzled and well he may. He is at a camouflage demonstration and has just been told that a man is concealed within ten feet of him. He doesn't know it, but in a moment the inoffensive looking rock at his feet will roll away and out will spring a soldier at the salute.

Copyright Committee on Public Information